

Karen Ng

Writing for the Sciences

Professor Williams

11/12/18

✓ +

Research Proposal

Introduction:

The most common reason why people have different personalities is because of the environment they are involved in and the type of influences they choose to surround themselves. However, the major influence that has the biggest impact on one's personality development are his/her parents whom they get to spend most of the time with throughout their lives from childhood to adulthood. Furthermore, parents hold responsible for their child's perspective based on how they discipline the child.

Nevertheless, there is another major factor behind a child's personality that most people tend to neglect which is the influence of the environment where parents grew up with.

For this reason, parents from different areas, based on poverty and wealth levels, tend to teach their children differently. For instance, parents from or in poor rural areas discipline their children in a strict manner because life is difficult to sustain when there are no sufficient resources. On the other hand, parents from or in wealthy areas discipline their children in a less strict manner because they have easy access to resources. As a result, parents set a life role model through local traditions and values.

Thus, People in rural areas are more disciplined than people in urban areas.

Background: